HOW DID THE FUND PERFORM AND WHAT AFFECTED ITS PERFORMANCE?

Over the past 6 months ending March 31, 2026, the FMI International Fund Institutional Class (“The Fund”) fell by 2.53%, compared with the MSCI EAFE® Index’s gain of 6.29% in local currency and 3.56% in U.S. Dollars. The Fund’s passive currency hedge was a tailwind, as the U.S. Dollar strengthened.

After a strong start to the period, international stock markets came under acute pressure in the wake of the Iran war (commenced on February 28, 2026). With energy prices soaring and the war ongoing, risk appetites have dampened. The most consequential development in the Iran war is the blockage of the Strait of Hormuz, where ~20% of the world’s global oil and liquified natural gas (LNG) pass through. Oil eclipsed $100 per barrel both in the U.S. and overseas, with fears that it could spike significantly higher from here if the conflict drags on. With the average price of fuel at the pump increasing significantly across the globe, consumers are already starting to feel the pinch. Like tariffs, high energy prices act as a de facto tax on consumers. Meanwhile, businesses are also facing headwinds on profit margins due to rising input and transportation costs (some shipping lanes are being rerouted to avoid the region). Global central banks find themselves in a difficult situation, contending with rising inflation and interest rates, while employment and economic growth are weakening. A prolonged conflict could trigger a recession, or perhaps worse, stagflation.

Not surprisingly, energy and defense stocks outperformed over the period. FMI’s portfolios have an underweight exposure to both given business quality and valuation considerations. FMI’s overweight exposure to service segments (commercial and consumer), as well as durables exposed to housing and construction, have also hurt our relative performance. Within the service segment we added to Booking Holdings Inc., a perceived AI loser, that we feel has a defensible niche. We have also leaned into those exposed to the housing repair and remodel (R&R) market. We believe this segment has an attractive long-term set-up, yet many companies have been discounted on cyclical pressures (higher rates, affordability challenges). Quality underperformed during the semi-annual period, also weighing on the relative comparison.

As investors try to navigate heightened geopolitical and economic uncertainty, FMI takes comfort knowing that our portfolios are comprised of advantaged businesses with robust balance sheets, that trade at discounts to their respective benchmarks.
