HOW DID THE FUND PERFORM AND WHAT AFFECTED ITS PERFORMANCE?

Over the past 12 months ending September 30, 2025, the FMI International Fund Institutional Class gained 4.25%, compared with the MSCI EAFE Index's return of 12.92% in local currency and 14.99% in U.S. Dollars. The passive currency hedge was a negligible headwind during the period.

The EAFE was driven by financials, defense companies, and unwavering enthusiasm around AI and technology. FMI has historically been underweight financials, and banks in particular, given their high leverage, opaque balance sheets, and low margins. We pick our spots, preferring financials with more competitively advantaged business models, such as insurance, money managers, rental companies, payment networks, and financial processors, which often have better return profiles and lower leverage. When rate-sensitive banks rally, the Fund typically gives up some relative ground. FMI's exposure to defense has also historically been limited, with concerns around business quality (reliance on government spending), growth prospects, and valuation. After the recent stock moves and blanket basket buying, current valuations are elevated.

The Fund strives to generate strong absolute returns through a full cycle while having less volatility, with a focus on downside protection. In environments characterized by speculative excess, as the one observed over the past year, the Fund's positioning has tended to lag broader benchmarks. Looking different than the market has been a disadvantage over this period. Regardless, FMI remains disciplined on business quality, balance sheet strength and valuation.

Finance accounted for 56% of the MSCI EAFE return over the trailing year. An underweight and relative stock selection in this sector was the largest driver of underperformance during the period. Conversely, the Fund's exposure in Pharmaceutical, Electrical Products, and Industrial Machinery Industries were additive to returns.
